Psychopath Free (Expanded Edition): Recovering From Emotionally Abusive Relationships With Narcissists, Sociopaths, And Other Toxic People

Synopsis

Have you ever been in a relationship with a psychopath? Chances are, even if you did, you would never know it. Psychopaths are cunning charmers and master manipulators, to the point where you start to accept the most extreme behaviors as normal. Even if it hurts you. All around us, every single day, human beings devoid of empathy are wreaking havoc and destroying lives in the coldest, most heartless ways imaginable. In constant pursuit of money, sex, influence, or simple entertainment, psychopaths will do whatever it takes to gain power over others. They hide behind a veil of normalcy, arranging their friends and partners like pawns in a game of chess. Using false praise and flattery to get what they want, they can lure any unsuspecting target into a relationship. Once hooked, their charming promises spin into mind games and psychological torture. Victims are left devastated and confused, unable to recognize the nightmare that just took place. This significantly expanded edition of Psychopath Free contains new chapters, updated content, and real survivor experiences. Written from the heart, it is the first guide for survivors written by a survivor, offering hope for healing and thriving after psychopathic abuse. Say goodbye to the chaos, self-doubt, and victimization. You are free.

Jackson MacKenzie is the co-founder of PsychopathFree.com, an online support community that reaches millions of abuse survivors each month. Driven by personal experience, his mission is to spread awareness and give survivors a safe place to validate their experiences, so that every empathetic person can find happiness and love after abuse.

ConnectIntroductionAn AdventureFinding yourself involved with a psychopath is an adventure, that's for sure. It will open your eyes to human nature, our broken society, and, perhaps most important of all, your own spirit. It's a dark journey that will throw you into spells of depression, rage, and loneliness. It will unravel your deepest insecurities, leaving you with a lingering emptiness that haunts your every breath. But ultimately, it will heal you. You will become stronger than you could ever imagine. You will understand who you are truly meant to be. And in the end, you will be glad it happened. No one ever believes me about that last part. At least, not at first. But I promise you, it's an adventure worth taking. One that will change your life forever. So what is a psychopath? How about a narcissist or a sociopath? They're manipulative people who are completely devoid of empathy who intentionally cause harm to others without any sense of remorse or responsibility. And despite some differences between each disorder, the bottom line is that their relationship cycles can be predicted like clockwork: Idealize, Devalue, Discard. Years ago, this cycle had me thinking I'd never be happy again. Falling in love had somehow wiped out my entire sense of self. Instead of being joyful and trusting, I had become an unrecognizable mess of insecurities and anxiety. But life is a lot of fun these days—mostly just running around outside in my bathing suit and eating pizza. And this is all thanks to a lucky Google search that led me to psychopathy, which led me to the friends who saved my life, which led us to cofound a tiny online recovery community, which now reaches millions of survivors every month! At PsychopathFree.com, we see new members join every single day, always with a seemingly hopeless and all-too-familiar tale. Left feeling lost and broken, they wonder if they will ever find happiness again. One year later, that person is nowhere to be found. In his or her place, there is a beautiful stranger who stands tall and helps others out from the shadows. A stranger who takes pride in their own greatest qualities: empathy, compassion, and kindness. A stranger who speaks of self-respect and boundaries. A stranger who practices introspection in order to better conquer their own demons. So what happened in that year? Well, a lot of good stuff. So much that I had to write a book. I might be biased—actually, I definitely am—but I think PsychopathFree.com has one of the coolest healing processes out there. We believe in education, open dialogue, validation, and self-discovery. We have a uniquely inspiring user base, full of resilient values and honest friendships. Yes, friendships. Because this journey is personal, but it's also remarkably universal. Whether it be a whirlwind romance, a scheming coworker, an abusive family member, or a life-consuming affair, a relationship with a psychopath is always the same. Your mind is left spinning. You feel worthless and lost. You become numb to the things that once made you happy. I cannot fix a toxic relationship (because toxic people cannot change), but I can give you a new place to start. And I can promise that you will feel joy again. You will learn to trust your intuition. You will walk this world with the wisdom of a survivor and the gentle wonder of a dreamer. But first, you'll need to forget everything you thought you knew about people. Understanding psychopathy requires letting go of your basic emotional instincts. Remember, these are people who prey on forgiveness. They thrive on your need for closure. They manipulate compassion and exploit sympathy. Since the dawn of time, psychopaths have waged psychological warfare on others by humiliating and shaming kind, unsuspecting victims—people who never asked for it; people who aren't even aware of the war until it's over. But this is all about to change. So say farewell to love triangles, cryptic letters, self-doubt, and manufactured anxiety. You will never again find yourself desperately awaiting a text from the person you love. You will never again censor your spirit for fear of losing the "perfect" relationship. You will never again be told to stop overanalyzing something that urgently needs analysis. You are no longer a pawn in the mind games of a psychopath. You are free. And now it's time for your adventure. Love, Jackson

Spotting Toxic People

Your strengthened intuition is the greatest defense against a manipulative person. It is a skill that can never be exploited—and once learned, it will serve you a lifetime.

30 Red Flags

There are a lot of phenomenal studies on the traits and characteristics of psychopaths. A quick Internet search will lead you to them. The red flags in this book are intended to supplement these resources. So what's different about this list? Well, for one, it's specifically about relationships. But it's also about you. Each point requires introspection and self-awareness. Because if you want to spot toxic people, you cannot focus entirely on their behavior—that's only half the battle. You must also come to recognize the looming red flags in your own heart. Then you will be ready for anything.

Gaslighting and crazy-making. They blatantly deny their own manipulative behavior and ignore evidence when confronted with it. They become dismissive and critical if you attempt to disprove their fabrications with facts. Instead of them actually addressing their inappropriate behavior, somehow it always becomes your fault for being "sensitive" and "crazy." Toxic people condition you to believe that the problem isn't the abuse itself, but instead your reactions to their abuse. Cannot put themselves in your shoes, or anyone else's, for that matter. You find yourself desperately trying to explain how they might feel if you were treating them this way, and they just stare at you blankly. You slowly learn not to communicate your feelings with them, because youâ€”are usually met with silence or annoyance. The ultimate hypocrite. â€”Do as I say, not as I do. They have extremely high expectations for fidelity, respect, and adoration. After the idealization phase, they will give none of this back to you. They will cheat, lie, criticize, and manipulate. But you are expected to remain perfect, otherwise you will promptly be replaced and deemed unstable. Pathological lying and excuses. There is always an excuse for everything, even things that donâ€”t require excusing. They make up lies faster than you can question them. They constantly blame othersâ€”it is never their fault. They spend more time rationalizing their behavior than improving it. Even when caught in a lie, they express no remorse or embarrassment. Oftentimes, it almost seems as if they wanted you to catch them. Focuses on your mistakes and ignores their own. If theyâ€”re two hours late, donâ€”t forget that you were once five minutes late to your first date. If you point out their inappropriate behavior, they will always be quick to turn the conversation back on you. You might begin to adopt perfectionist qualities, very aware that any mistake can and will be used against you. You find yourself explaining the basic elements of human respect to a full-grown man or woman. Normal people understand fundamental concepts like honesty and kindness. Psychopaths often appear to be childlike and innocent, but donâ€”t let this mask fool you. No adult should need to be told how he or she is making other people feel. Selfishness and a crippling thirst for attention. They drain the energy from you and consume your entire life. Their demand for adoration is insatiable. You thought you were the only one who could make them happy, but now you feel that anyone with a beating pulse could fit the role. However, the truth is: no one can fill the void of a psychopathâ€”s soul. Accuses you of feeling emotions that they are intentionally provoking. They call you jealous after blatantly flirting with an exâ€”often done over social networking for the entire world to see. They call you needy after intentionally ignoring you for days on end. They use your manufactured reactions to garner sympathy from other targets, trying to prove how â€”hystericalâ€” youâ€”ve become. You probably once considered yourself to be an exceptionally easygoing person, but an encounter with a psychopath will (temporarily) turn that notion upside down. You find yourself playing detective. Itâ€”s never happened in any other relationship, but suddenly youâ€”re investigating the person you once trusted unconditionally. If theyâ€”re active on Facebook, you start scrolling back years on their posts and albums. Same with their ex. Youâ€”re seeking answers to a feeling you canâ€”t quite explain. You are the only one who sees their true colors. No matter what they do, they always seem to have a fan club cheering for them. The psychopath uses these people for money, resources, and attention. •but the fan club won't notice, because this person strategically distracts them with shallow praise. Psychopaths are able to maintain superficial friendships far longer than relationships. You fear that any fight could be your last. Normal couples argue to resolve issues, but psychopaths make it clear that negative conversations will jeopardize the relationship, especially ones regarding their behavior. Any of your attempts to improve communication will typically result in the silent treatment. You apologize and forgive quickly, otherwise you know they'll lose interest in you. Slowly and steadily erodes your boundaries. They criticize you with a condescending, joking sort of attitude. They smirk when you try to express yourself. Teasing becomes the primary mode of communication in your relationship. They subtly belittle your intelligence and abilities. If you point this out, they call you sensitive and crazy. You might begin to feel resentful and upset, but you learn to push away those feelings in favor of maintaining the peace. They withhold attention and undermine your self-esteem. After once showering you with nonstop attention and admiration, they suddenly seem completely bored by you. They treat you with silence and become very annoyed that you're interested in continuing the passionate relationship that they created. You begin to feel like a chore to them. They expect you to read their mind. If they stop communicating with you for several days, it's your fault for not knowing about the plans they never told you about. There will always be an excuse that makes them out to be the victim to go along with this. They make important decisions about the relationship and they inform everyone except you. You feel on edge around this person, but you still want them to like you. You find yourself writing off most of their questionable behavior as accidental or insensitive, because you're in constant competition with others for their attention and praise. They don't seem to care when you leave their side. •they can just as easily move on to the next source of energy. An unusual number of "crazy" people in their past. Any ex-partner or friend who did not come crawling back to them will likely be labeled jealous, bipolar, an alcoholic, or some other nasty smear. Make no mistake: they will speak about you the same way to their next target. Provokes jealousy and rivalries while maintaining their cover of innocence. They once directed all of their attention to you, which makes it especially confusing when they begin to withdraw and focus on other people. They do things that constantly make you doubt your place in their heart. If they're active on social media, they'll bait previously denounced exes with old songs, photos, and inside jokes. They attend to the “competition” activity and ignore yours. Idealization, love-bombing, and flattery. When you first meet, things move extremely fast. They tell you how much they have in common with you • how perfect you are for them. Like a chameleon, they mirror your hopes, dreams, and insecurities in order to form an immediate bond of trust and excitement. They constantly initiate communication and seem to be fascinated with you on every level. If you have a Facebook page, they might plaster it with songs, compliments, poems, and inside jokes. Compares you to everyone else in their life. They compare you to ex-lovers, friends, family members, and your eventual replacement. When idealizing, they make you feel special by telling you how much better you are than these people. When devaluing, they use these comparisons to make you feel jealous and inferior. The qualities they once claimed to admire about you suddenly become glaring faults. At first, they appeal to your deepest vanities and vulnerabilities, observing and mimicking exactly what they think you want to hear. But after you’re hooked, they start to use these things against you. You spend more and more time trying to prove yourself worthy to the very same person who once said you were perfect. Cracks in their mask. There are fleeting moments when the charming, cute, innocent persona is replaced by something else entirely. You see a side to them that never came out during the idealization phase, and it is a side that’s cold, inconsiderate, and manipulative. You start to notice that their personality just doesn’t add up • that the person you fell in love with doesn’t actually seem to exist. Easily bored. They are constantly surrounded by other people, stimulated and praised at all times. They can’t tolerate being alone for an extended period of time. They become quickly uninterested by anything that doesn’t directly impact them in a positive or thrilling way. At first, you might think they’re exciting and worldly, and you feel inferior for preferring familiarity and consistency. Triangulation. They surround themselves with former lovers, potential mates, and anyone else who provides them with added attention. This includes people that the psychopath may have previously denounced and declared you superior to. This makes you feel confused and creates the perception that the psychopath is in high demand at all times. Covert abuse. From an early age, most of us were taught to identify physical mistreatment and blatant verbal insults, but with psychopaths, the abuse is not so obvious. You likely won’t even understand that you were in an abusive relationship until long after it’s over. Through personalized idealization and subtle devaluation, a psychopath can effectively erode the identity of any chosen target. From an outsider's perspective, you will appear to have "lost it," while the psychopath calmly walks away, completely unscathed. Pity plays and sympathy stories. Their bad behavior always has sob-story roots. They claim to behave this way because of an abusive ex, an abusive parent, or an abusive cat. They say that all they've ever wanted is some peace and quiet. They say they hate drama and yet there's more drama surrounding them than anyone you've ever known. The mean and sweet cycle. Sometimes they shower you with attention, sometimes they ignore you, sometimes they criticize you. They treat you differently in public than they do behind closed doors. They could be talking about marriage one day and breaking up the next. You never know where you stand with them. As my morning-coffee friend Rydia wrote: "They put forth as little effort as possible and then step it up when you try to disengage." This person becomes your entire life.

You're spending more of your time with them and their friends, and less time with your own support network. They're all you think and talk about anymore. You isolate yourself in order to make sure you're available for them. You cancel plans and eagerly wait by the phone for their next communication. For some reason, the relationship seems to involve a lot of sacrifices on your end, but very few on theirs. Arrogance. Despite the humble, sweet image they presented in the early stages, you start to notice an unmistakable air of superiority about them. They talk down to you as if you are intellectually deficient and emotionally unstable. They have no shame when it comes to flaunting new targets after the breakup, ensuring that you see how happy they are without you. Backstabbing gossip that changes on a whim. They plant little seeds of poison, whispering about everyone, idealizing them to their face, and then complaining about them behind their backs. You find yourself disliking or resenting people you've never even met. For some reason, you might even feel special for being the one he or she complains to. But once the relationship turns sour, they'll run back to everyone they once insulted to you, lamenting about how crazy you've become. Your feelings. Your natural love and compassion has transformed into overwhelming panic and anxiety. You apologize and cry more than you ever have in your life. You barely sleep, and you wake up every morning feeling anxious and unhinged. You have no idea what happened to your old relaxed, fun, easygoing self. After a run-in with a psychopath, you will feel insane, exhausted, drained, shocked, and empty. You tear apart your entire life—spending money, ending friendships, and searching for some sort of reason behind it all. You will find that normal, loving people do not raise any of these flags. After an encounter with a psychopath, most survivors face the struggle of hypervigilance: Who can really be trusted? Your gauge will swing back and forth for a while, like a volatile pendulum. You will wonder if you've gone absolutely mad, wanting to believe the best in an old friend or a new date, but feeling sick to your stomach when you actually spend time with them because you're waiting for the manipulative behavior to start. Developing your intuition is a personal process, but I would leave you with this: the world is mostly full of good people, and you don't want to miss out on that because you've been hurt. Spend some time getting in touch with your feelings. Keep tweaking until you find a comfortable balance between awareness and trust. Look within and understand why you felt the way you did when you were with your abusive partner and how you felt before you met them. You will discover that many old relationships may need revisiting. And as you begin to abandon toxic patterns, healthier ones will inevitably appear in their place. To quote a longtime member and friend, Phoenix, you will stop asking "Do they like me?" and start asking "Do I like them?" What Is Normal? If your "soul mate" went from fascinated to bored in the blink of an eye, this is not normal. If you were called jealous and crazy by someone who actively cheated on you, this is not normal. If you were desperately waiting by your phone for texts they once initiated on a minute-by-minute basis, this is not normal. If all of their exes were "bipolar" or "madly in love" with them, this is not normal. Psychopaths are parasitic, emotionally stunted, and incapable of change. Once this individual is gone from your life, you will find that everything begins to make sense again. The chaos dissipates and your sanity returns. Things will be normal once again. Beware the Vultures You are taking the first steps to recover from a toxic relationship with a psychopath. That's great! The work you'll be doing will not only free you from the grasp of your abuser, but it will also enable you to reclaim yourself—the self that was trampled on, beaten down, and transformed into a shell of who you once were. I know it may be difficult to face some of the truths we'll be exploring, but it's also empowering, as you'll see how much you've survived, how strong you really are. As you begin this work, I strongly encourage you to seek out a recovery professional or a healing community. You'll need the support and, at times, an encouraging reminder that you're on the right path. I'd like to extend a special warning to those of you who are new to recovery. After psychopathic abuse, you're going to be extremely raw and vulnerable. As you start to put the pieces together, you'll feel devastated, miserable, and angry. It's overwhelming. You're probably used to repressing your emotions and dealing with things on your own. But this time, everything is out in the open. You're dependent like a newborn child, seeking out someone—anyone—to understand what you’re going through. In general, it’s important to be open with your emotions. But at your most insecure moments, you may unknowingly open the floodgates for more abuse. It’s no mystery that survivors seem to attract more pathological people like magnets. As you frantically share your story, you latch on to the quickest and most sympathetic ear—anyone who claims to understand you. The problem is, these people do not always have your best interests at heart. Those willing to listen to your psychopathic story for hours on end are, unfortunately, not likely to be people who are truly invested in your recovery. They are most likely “vultures.” Vultures often seem exceptionally kind and warm at first. They want to fix you and absorb your problems. They are fascinated by your struggles. But sooner or later, you will find yourself lost in another nightmare. They begin drowning you in unsolicited advice. They need constant praise and attention. You are never allowed to disagree with them. They feed off drama and an insatiable need to be appreciated by others. You will find that they lash out as you become happier. They perceive your progress as a threat to their control. They want to keep you in a perpetual state of dependency. They do not want you to seek help from anyone except them. Whether these people are pathological or not, you don’t need this toxic garbage after what you’ve been through. I would strongly urge all survivors to avoid seeking out new friendships and relationships for at least a few months. You must get to the point where you no longer need—or want—to talk about your abuser anymore. When you do need help, stick to professional therapy or recovery communities and services. These people know what you’ve been through, and you’re going to find that all of them are willing to help—with no strings attached. I understand the temptation to go out and meet new people. You’re looking to start rebuilding your life. You want to surround yourself with kinder and more genuine friends. And you will. But real friends won’t be acting as your therapist, and they definitely won’t be rambling on about their ability to empathize and care. Their actions should speak louder than their words. It takes a long time to start building healthier relationships. It takes breaking old habits, forming new ones, developing your intuition, and finally coming to understand what it is that you want from this world. So be on the lookout for vultures. In the writing world, there’s a universal rule called “show, don’t tell.” This rule also applies to people. If you encounter someone who’s constantly telling you who they are, how much they want to help you, how they will make things right for you, take a step back and look at their actual behavior. Manipulative people are always telling—because they have nothing good to show. Their inappropriate and dishonest actions never actually match up with their promising words, causing an overwhelming cognitive dissonance in the people who trust them. You will find that decent, humble human beings aren't trying to tell you who they are and what they can do for you. They simply show it through consistent love and kindness. You never need to question them, because their intentions are always pure. Vultures, on the other hand, are really acting out of self-interest; they want to be praised and adored. In an argument, a "teller" will frequently remind you of how well they treat you, even after blatantly hurting you. A "show-er" will simply share their point of view without trying to twist the conversation in their favor. Avoid those who tell you how nice they are, how generous they are, how successful they are, how honest they are, and how important they are. Instead, search for the quiet ones who show these qualities every day through their actions. The Constant You know about psychopaths. You've got the red flags. So now the big question: Are you really involved with a psychopath? Well, barring any major scientific advancements, you really can't know for certain whether or not someone has a conscience. In fact, I don't think there's any approach that will allow you to spot a psychopath with 100 percent confidence. Fortunately, there's a different way to keep yourself safe. And this one involves looking within. It will work with anyone, anywhere, anytime. It's a question with answers—lots of them. "How are you feeling today?" Seriously, I'm asking you. Because most people might respond with a vague "fine" and follow up with a casual comment about their weekend, a promotion at work, or their favorite television show. But what about you? Perhaps you're feeling empty? Broken? Hopeless? Maybe you woke up with that constant aching in your heart, eating away at your soul like a cancer. You spend the day trying to keep your thoughts free from painful topics—only to find that your mind keeps racing right back to them. Memories that once brought you so much joy now make you feel sick. You oscillate between anger and depression because you are unable to decide which one hurts less. Those are answers. So when you feel those things after a relationship, does it really matter if your ex was a psychopath, a sociopath, a narcissist, or a garden-variety jerk? The label doesn't make your feelings any more or less valid. Your feelings are absolutes. They will endure, no matter which word you settle upon. And here's what you know from those feelings: someone uprooted your life, introducing a new kind of anxiety that you've never felt before. They've introduced you to a whole range of horrible emotions that make each day seem unbearable. During the relationship, you may have felt constantly on edge and unhinged, worried that any mistake could mark the end of your dream. Maybe you found yourself desperately comparing yourself to other people, trying to win back your rightful place by your partner's side. So I ask you again, does it matter if they are a psychopath by definition? You already have everything you need to know—^{from your own feelings.} You felt horrible around them, right? So during the relationship, why wasn't that enough to confirm that they should have no place in your life? Because you were groomed and idealized. You were tricked into falling in love—^{the strongest of all human bonds}—so that your feelings could be more easily manipulated. Toxic people condition us to ignore our intuition, and we must learn to trust it again. Instead of judging outwardly, we need to perceive inwardly. When we start focusing on our own feelings, this is where the healing begins. And if you are anything like me, we can agree on this simple truth: good people make you feel good and bad people make you feel bad. Everything else falls into place from there. Don't listen to the folks who say your feelings should be totally independent of the world around you. If you've got an open heart, that's impossible. As human beings, we have this incredible gift—the ability to make another person feel wonderful. With a word, a gesture, or a quiet smile. It's what makes the world beautiful. Some people would call this love. But you experienced an abuser, someone who manipulated this gift in order to cause pain. And now you want to know how to avoid people like this so it'll never happen again. You're worried that you've become hypervigilant—^{untrusting of everyone and everything around you.} You feel that you need a little something extra. Something beyond your intuition. So this is where I'd like to introduce the idea of a Constant. Your Constant will comfort and protect you throughout this book, and for the rest of your life. Think of someone you love. Someone who consistently inspires and never disappoints. It could be anyone—^{your mom, a close friend, your children, your cat, a deceased relative.} Really, anyone. You might feel that you have no Constant. Of course you do; you can even dream one up. Imagine a higher power in your mind—one that brings peace to your heart. Colorful, glowing, and full of life. Embodying all of the qualities you admire most: empathy, compassion, kindness. A gentle spirit who will always keep you safe. And voilà, you have a Constant. So now that you've got a Constant in mind (tangible or imagined), I have some questions. Does your Constant make you feel unhinged? Anxious? Jealous? Does your heart rise up into your throat when they speak to you? When you're away from your Constant, do you spend hours analyzing their behavior and defending yourself from hypothetical arguments? Of course not. So why is that? Why can one dismissive person make you doubt everything good going on in your life? What's the difference between your Constant and the people who make you feel like garbage? If you can't answer these questions quite yet, you're not alone. And that's the beauty of it all. You do not need to understand why you don't like being around a person.

You have a Constant, and that's all you need to know for now. Self-respect comes later. Your Constant is a private reminder that you are not crazy, even when it feels like you're taking on the entire world. With time, you will begin to filter out the people who make you feel bad. You realize that you do not need to put up with negativity when there is a Constant who brings out the best in you. Once you become more comfortable with the idea, you'll be ready to ask the most important question of all: Shouldn't I feel this same kind of peace with everyone in my life? Absolutely. So let's get started.

the manufactured soul mate Perhaps most insidious of all the psychopath's evils: their relationship cycle, during which they gleefully and systematically wipe out the identity of an unsuspecting victim. Cold and calculated emotional rape.

Personalized Grooming The psychopath trains you to become the perfect partner. In a matter of weeks, they take over your entire life, consuming your mind and body with unrivaled pleasure. Ultimately, you are to become their newest source of endless adoration and praise—but first, you must fall in love. Then your heart will be open to their every suggestion.

There are three key components to this process: idealization, indirect persuasion, and testing the waters.

Idealization The idealization phase in a psychopathic relationship will be unlike anything you've ever experienced. You will be swept off your feet, lost in a passionate fantasy with someone who excites you on every level: emotionally, spiritually, and sexually. They will be the first thing on your mind when you wake up in the morning, waiting for their cheerful, funny texts to start your day. You will quickly find yourself planning a future with them—forgetting about the dull realities of life. None of that matters anymore. They're the person you want to spend the rest of your life with.

One day, out of the blue, your confusing and emotionally-charged romance abruptly ends. Your partner is gone like the wind and into a new relationship in zero seconds flat. You're left absolutely devastated and wondering what the hell happened to you. You start searching the internet with terms like "cheating girlfriend" and "abusive boyfriend" and eventually you stumble onto websites discussing Psychopaths, Narcissists, and other disordered and toxic people. It isn't long before the dire reality hits you - you've been targeted by a predator, and you aren't alone. Up to 1 in 25 people walking this earth are psychopaths and the wide majority will remain undiagnosed, flying under society's radar, for their entire lives.

The pseudonymous author has laid out all the important characteristics of the garden-variety psychopath and the inevitable harm he heaps upon his romantic partners in the relationship cycle of idealization, devaluation, and discarding. He writes in layman's terms the effect the deception, covert and overt abuse, manipulation, and pathological lying have on the partner's psyche. He discusses specific steps to take to break free of the trauma bond and begin walking the path towards a healthy life and healthy relationships. The author is walking the path to freedom himself and gives credit to those who have helped him along the way - from clinical researchers to a group of online friends, also survivors, who are working to heal as well. It's important to note that this book is written in terms that a person fresh out of an abusive relationship can read without the dry clinical terminology and confusing verbiage. It is obviously written by a thoughtful and caring person who wishes to give something to those who are feeling pain and confusion of such devastating loss. I highly recommend this book.

I've never written a review for before. This is the first time (and may very well be my last time). I'm writing this review because, point blank, this book changed my life. And adding to the stars here is the only way I can reach out to anyone else who's gone through the horrible, self degenerating experience of being with a psychopath. This book can heal you. It's the equivalent of some kind of a magic pill in written form. And it's written purely FOR the victim and about the victim. It's not about the sociopath. It's about what they did to you, and why you're not wrong. I can only compare reading this book to being six years old, and being held and loved by one of my parents. It's the kindest thing you can give to yourself. For me at least, every word in this book literally happened to me -- down to exact quotes. For years and years I've struggled to even ADMIT that the man I loved was a psychopath -- because I didn't want to believe it and because I'd been conditioned to think that everything was my fault. 5 pages into this book, I started to ball my eyes out. Not because I was missing the man that tortured me for years then ditched me like a piece of trash -- but because for the first time in 20 years I was able to fully believe that I was not to blame. I could see things from a perspective I never could see before, despite all the efforts of the people around me. I always thought everything was my fault and was gaslighted to the point that I thought I was just crazy. This book is a gift. It is the kindest gift you can ever give to yourself. No retribution, no therapy and no other person can replace the time spent alone, thinking, reading, and seeing everything you went through in black and white text.

What can I say about "Psychopath Free" by Jackson MacKenzie that hasn't already been said? It is truly the best book out there on psychological abuse. As a therapist who specializes in the recovery from psychological abuse, this is the very first resource I ask new clients to read. I also have it as a training manual for new staff therapists and interns. If someone is going to read one book to help them understand what has happened to them or a loved one, THIS is the book to read. I am truly grateful that this book is available for survivors and therapists who need to learn more about this form of abuse. True Excellence!

If you or a loved one has ever suffered at the hands of an awful person, then you NEED this book!! It has been life changing and saving my life since reading. I'm surrounded by those in this book. They have even gone so far as to very covertly ruin my life. After everything in this book, I'm able to finally have the healthy brain "food" to feed my head and repair my life. Thank you to the writer. I know it must have been so painful to write but I appreciate your wisdom beyond words.

I have been in a 26 year marriage and have finally gotten the courage to get out of. This book was something that confirmed the decision for me. I cried reading this. How can someone you love be so cold and calculating, no conscience, not loyal to anyone, self entitled, always lying and all the while making you believe that you are losing your mind? I really believe that this type of person will never be able to love anyone but themselves. It's always someone else's fault never their own. I believe people that are like this do get it in the end. You can't go through life without accountability. There are consequences for our behavior. Good or bad. It is sad though the people that suffer in their hands. It took over half my life to realize it wasn't me after all. A good read. I wish I had this book 25 years ago. Could have saved me a lot of heartache. I now look forward to the next chapter of my life w/out the toxic person in it.
